Philosopher in Print

This month's 'Philosopher in Print' is graduate student, Grace Hibshman. Her article, "Narrative, Second-Person Experience, and Self-Perception: A Reason it is Good to Conceive of One's Life Narratively", is available in the July issue of The Philosophical Quarterly.

Abstract

It is widely held that it is good to conceive of one's life narratively, but why this is the case has not been well established. I argue that conceiving of one's life narratively can contribute to one's flourishing by mediating to oneself a second-person experience of oneself, furnishing one with valuable second-personal productive distance from oneself and as a result self-understanding. Drawing on Eleonore Stump's theory that narratives re-present to their audiences the second-person experiences they depict, I argue that conceiving of one's life narratively facilitates taking on the second-person experience that an audience would have in hearing one's life narrative, mediating how someone from a second-person perspective might perceive oneself and as a result yielding valuable self-understanding. I conclude with some practical implications.
