Philosopher in Print

This month's 'Philosopher in Print' is grad student Oliver Traldi. His paper titled, "Uncoordinated Norms of Belief", is now available in the January edition of the Australasian Journal of Philosophy.

Abstract

If it is ethically wrong to hold some beliefs, there may be a conflict between the demands of morality and the demands of rationality. A recent theory holds that no such conflict exists: any morally wrong belief is also irrational to hold, made irrational through a phenomenon of radical moral encroachment. In this paper, I argue that radical moral encroachment fails to coordinate ethical and epistemic norms, given plausible epistemological principles and various substantive accounts of which beliefs are morally wrong, including those endorsed by radical moral encroachment theorists themselves.
